Mental Health Professionals Lack Training on the Psychology of Money

FinancialPsychologyCeus.com Offers the Training Professionals Need to Deal with Clients' Money Issues

Atlanta, GA., May XX, 2010 — The vast majority of mental health professionals today receive little or no education or training related to financial psychology and money related issues. FinancialPsychologyCeus.com, a new Atlanta company, is changing that by offering a wide variety of continuing education courses focused on financial psychology and money's relationship to overall wellness.

"The subject of money is a taboo topic in today's culture, even in the mental health profession," says Dr. Joe Lowrance, president and founder of FinancialPsychologyCeus.com. "Throughout our society, we have this social prohibition when it comes to discussing money in an open and honest fashion. Unfortunately, mental health professionals haven't gotten the training they need to deal with their clients' money related issues. Our goal is to provide that training."

The company recently launched www.FinancialPsychologyCeus.com, an online training website, designed specifically for mental health professionals. The site, the first of its kind for mental health professionals, is a collaborative project where leading experts on financial psychology and money-related issues come together to offer online continuing education courses on money-related topics.

"Surprisingly, despite the bankruptcies, job losses, foreclosures and other relevant financial matters in today's world, and despite the acknowledgement of money as a primary source of stress, most mental health professionals are ill-equipped to serve their clients when it comes financial psychology," adds Dr. Lowrance, a licensed and practicing clinical psychologist.

With FinancialPsychologyCeus.com, mental health professionals can gain the training they need through continuing education courses available online 24 hours, 7 days a week. An ever-growing course catalogue covers a diverse range of money-treated topics. Each course is designed to aid mental health professionals to develop a fundamental understanding of specific areas of financial psychology and position those professionals to better serve their clients in the treatment setting.

FinancialPsychologyCeus.com is an approved sponsor of continuing education by the major national mental health professional associations, including the American Psychological Association, the National Association of Social Workers, the National Board for Certified Counselors, NAADAC – the Association for Additional Professionals, and the Board of Registered Nursing, as well as a number of state professional licensing commissions.
